This book is about the principles behind the open government data movement and its development in the United States. The movement is framed as the application of Big Data to civics, where Big Data is not just the size of data but the ability for data to change the way we understand its subject. Topics include principles of open government data, the history of the movement, applications to transparency and civic engagement, a brief legal history, data quality, civic hacking, and paradoxes in transparency.

This book is organized into chapters covering the movement and its history, examples and a typology of open government data applications, a brief legal history of open government data, principles and recommendations for creating open government data, and limitations in the use of data for government transparency. The appendix includes excerpts of open data policy language and model language.

Joshua Tauberer (@JoshData) is the creator of GovTrack.us, which launched in 2004 and spurred the national open government data community. He was also a co-founder of POPVOX.com, a platform for advocacy. He holds a Ph.D. from the University of Pennsylvania in linguistics.

Very nice

By Antonio Vetro'

The author was able to introduce the open data concepts in a way that is understandable by non technical people, but in the same time providing technical insights and always assuming a critical position.
